IN THE LAW SCHOOLS

The John Marshall Law School Board of Trustees approved the appointments of two new associate deans at its June 7 meeting.

Margaret O’Mara Frossard was named associate dean for professionalism and career strategy.

Anthony S. Niedwiecki was named associate dean for skills, experiential learning and assessment.

After serving as a judge for 22 years, including 13 years on the Illinois Appellate Court, Frossard came to the law school as director of professionalism and engagement in 2011. She was named director of professionalism and career strategy in January.

In her role as associate dean, Frossard is supervising the career services office and is responsible for implementing programs for students to develop career-related skills throughout law school and for implementing programs to facilitate job placement for graduates.

Niedwiecki has been serving as director of John Marshall's lawyering skills program.

As associate dean, he will continue directing that program and will take on responsibilities for the school's overall experiential learning requirement.

He will also develop and institute a broad assessment program for the school.
